

The Cursed Water.
A LEGEND.
In the land of Arabia once lived an old man who had spent his life in searching after the "philosopher's stone," by means of which one could make gold in any desired quantity, also an elixir to ward off old age and preserve eternal youth and vigor.
Abu Taleb, as the old man was called, was named, lived in a capacious room with a large fire-place, and had mortars of iron and glass, pincers of various sizes, crucibles, furnaces and bellows. On long shelves were bottles and jars filled with liquids of various colors, the poisonous drugs having a skull painted on them, and in the corner of the kitchen an old blanket was spread, on which the alchemist rested at night an hour or two, when he did not look at the stars in the blue firmament above.
His house stood on the borders of a great desert, and his sister Kadja lived with him. She was exceedingly avaricious, and therefore said one day to herself: "My brother has his head always full of other things and hardly knows what he is eating, whether I cook delicious meals for him or give him only pulse to eat and water to drink." She, therefore, took twice a day, or fourteen times a week, barley flour, poured hot water over it, and added occasionally a little butter, and placed this very frugal meal on her brother's table. One day, however, when Abu Taleb thought the propitious hour arrived, and the lead in his crucible would soon be transformed into pure gold, he ate but very little of his porridge, and poured the rest into a tub, to prevent his sister from reproving him by untimely questions.
Thus the remnant was left in the tub, as the alchemist had poured it out, and gradually began to spread an odor. The sensitive nose of Abu Taleb soon perceived the spirit in it, and he did not rest until he had separated it from the husks and poured it in a bottle. When he tasted it he found that it circulated through his veins like fire, and made him believe that he had indeed found the water of life. No wonder that he concluded to make the most of it. He, therefore, ate from that time but one-third of his porridge, just enough to keep him from starving, and poured the rest in his tub, in order to obtain more and more of his precious water.
Meanwhile a great famine came over the land, and a half-starved little boy, whose parents had already died, approached the window to beg for food left on the table, but Abu Taleb poured it rather into his tub and chased the poor starving orphan from his threshold, till he lost his way in the desert and laid down under a shrub to die.
Then the guardian angel of the child approached, with tears in his eyes, the throne of God and accused Abu Taleb of having caused the death of the orphan. And the Lord said to the ministering angel, "Hasten down and curse the beverage which Abu Taleb prepared of barley and water, and all which will be henceforth prepared. Curse them even to the ends of the earth."
And then the angel went forth, and bedded first the body of the little boy on soft moss, and rolled four heavy stones over his grave, that he might sleep securely untouched by the wild beasts of desert. Then he entered the laboratory of the alchemist, stepped near the bottle which contained the liquid, and said, "Cursed be thou! Those who drink of thee shall think they are taking healing medicine, but thou shalt prove a poison unto them. Those who use thee shall mean to derive strength from thee, but thou shalt be unto them like water poured into a blazing coal fire, which does not extinguish it, but increases its heat: thou shalt consume their strength as vinegar destroys steel. Thou shalt weaken the body of man and wrap his soul into utter darkness. Those who drink of thee thou shalt bind with stronger fetters than tyrants do their slaves; and when thy friends curse thee at the dawn of day, and cry and sigh over their misery, they shall not be able to do without thee and with trembling hands reach after thee."
Thus spake the angel of the Lord, and returned whence he had come.
After this Abu Taleb died, and being guilty of the death of the orphan child and burdened with the great weight of his sin, sank down to the lowest part of the earth, like a millstone which has been cast into the sea.
Not one little starving child, but many, many have been slain with hunger, while the sweetest wholesome grain of the field which should have been fed of the field, has been turned into the curse fire-water.
